

1. How did you first begin using Google services in your work?
2. How did you create your work?
3. What response did you receive from the public?
4. What plans do you have for your work in the future?

Paolo Cirio

Italian media artist Paolo Cirio examines the potential and limitations of contemporary management systems of information through drawings, acting, video art, and installation art. His favorite subjects include privacy issues, finance, copyright, and democracy. His 2012 work Street Ghost was created by printing life-size figures taken from Google Street View and installing them on the actual, physical locations in the screenshots, which include streets of London, Berlin, and New York. People in the pictures are automatically blurred by Google and they look like ghosts. He sees the figures as victims of an information war being fought against algorithms.

ANSWER

1. The data provided by internet giants is abundant and even immortal, so it serves as a versatile material for artists. It might be considered a new form of freedom of speech to freely utilize and display these data.
2. I leaf through Google Street View images for places with walls where I can attach posters and stay as long as possible, and then look for people who are the most recognizable in Google Street View. With maps, pictures, and adhesives for wallpaper, I go to the place to work the whole night, and when the day breaks I take pictures. So far, I've found almost 200 candidates in three cities, but some of them are impossible to work on because the locations have changed a lot since they were captured.
3. The people in the pictures might recognize their own faces when they accidentally walk by again, but so far I've had no responses. Instead, I received some enthusiastic responses from the Internet. Someone suggested doing a collaboration of displaying posters all over the world, and another one sent his own image taken from Google Street View. Perhaps this project was expanded because of the Internet, rather than street posters.
4. I have no plans for the time being because I've done enough works dealing with Google's infringement upon portrait rights and privacy. I'm currently preparing something called Global Direct Governance.

Reader Manual

02 Intro

Via Google Earth, B takes a bird's eye view of Google's past and the present, from its origins as a startup in a Silicon Valley garage to its current position as an Internet titan and the Valley's most representative company.

28 Lineup

B takes a look at the services currently offered by Google, from the company's operating system and web mail, to its entertainment and social network services. Google's strength can be felt in the way that using one Google service organically leads to using another.

30 Impressions

Everyone uses Google's services in their own way. These differences in use result in each user gaining a different impression of the company.

36 Symbiosis

B asks frequent Google users about other products they use to supplement gaps in Google's offerings.

44 Activate Google

B uses Google's own services to find more information about the company.

64 Google Generation

Google, the most powerful player on the Internet, has created a new generation that is influenced by the company either directly or indirectly. It is fair enough to call them the "Google generation."

90 G-Words

Newly-coined words derived from the company's name have significant meaning in that they are invented and used by users.

92 Creators

Google's services are often used as artistic tools. B speaks to the artists behind some of those artworks to find out more about their meaning and creation.

110 Campus

B looks around the Google campus to catch a glimpse of the company's famously creative work environment. The atmosphere there is cerebral, and not unlike a university campus. The Googlers are engrossed in making the best Internet services in the world.

120 Brand Story

Google started out of a small garage as a search engine developed by two Stanford graduates, Larry Page and Sergey Brin. Google moved to Silicon Valley in 1999 and has progressed dramatically over the last 15 years, offering a diverse range of user-oriented services and reshaping the landscape of the IT ecosystem.

150 Outro

Google exists everywhere; in many of the things we see and touch every day. In ways both big and small, the company pervades our lives.
